

Lost Case Of Being Found

Scott H. Biram

A message from Scott H. Biram about Lost Case of Being Found (thanks man)

well the thing about lost case is that there are different single notes picked out of the chords as the progression goes on...And these single notes act as the bass line. some of the single bass notes aren't necessarily the root note of the chord...So there's a bass note then a strum of the chord. Just because the bass note changes doesn't mean the chord has changed.. It's like G(strum G) B(strum G) Am(strum Am) E(strum Am) C(strum C) E(strum C) G(strum G) the rest is just plain old open chords except the break and I don't even know how to explain that weird sliding around thing. I know music but when it comes to describing or transcribing guitar...I can't say I know how to put in words or tell people how to do it really.. I can show someone but I don't know how to say it on an email. Hope that helps a little... SHB

Let me tell you bout this one horse town, it's like a handfull that come unwound
It's like a lost case of being found, so baby roll your window down
Well I spent last night staring at the moon, praying that you would be back soon
I lay down where I lay with you and i went back and laid in my room

She got a head full of I don't know she's crazy in the head ya know
She's a lot like this one horse town, it's like a hand full that's come unwound
It's like a lost case of being found, so baby roll your window down

I been a smoking that ole reefer down I got a lost case of being found
It's like a hand full that come unwound

I realize i didn t tab out the middle sliding part, but like he said, it s hard to explain in tab form.
